

Is there too much violence on television? Perhaps. But what happened to parents taking responsibility over what their children watch? Much like the "obscenity" debate, I feel that the FCC should not have a hand in this. When did the FCC become the office of censorship? I realize it has been going on for a long time, but it is time to stop. If parents don't want their kids watching these shows that they claim are violent or obscene, then it is their responsibility to make sure they don't watch them. Is this violence on cable? Don't subscribe! Use that V-chip! Is it on broadcast channels? Complain to the TV station. Or the advertisers. Advertisers fund much of the money to keep a network going. Perhaps you can get them to pull funding. If that doesn't work, maybe you should have your kids read or go outside more. No one is making your kids watch TV, so don't presume to make me watch kid-friendly garbage just because you don't want to act like an adult and take an active interest in your kids! The FCC has no place in this or "obscenity" regulation!
